

ADVANTAGES OF USING LEADERSHIP RESOURCES

There are hundreds of resources on becoming a better supervisor, but who has time to read this stuff and incorporate it into one's supervision style? I think supervisors often must muddle through with trial and error until we learn how to be supervisors, right?

Lots of articles and leadership training programs focused on supervisory skills are being published and advertised. The answer to 'who has time to read & incorporate these skills?' and your hope that you will acquire needed supervisory skills by 'muddling through with trial and error' might put major aspects of productivity and teamwork at risk in your setting. Start by asking yourself:

1. What risk is there that I may lose great talent? Individuals who may get impatient with my 'muddle through' strategy may be top-notch team members!
2. A team with widely diverse talent and versatile teaming skills is often a well-oiled productive machine! However when the machine clatters too loudly, a supervisor MUST STEP INTO, rather than away from the problem
3. Acquire a mentor... If you can, choose a supervisory mentor who does well generating cooperative responses from others. Would a coaching arrangement work out? Why not ask a manager or HR staff about the possibilities of coaching mentorships!
4. In a few moments of alone time, as your shift begins, quietly reflect on experiences, strengths, and goals for improvement!
